Greetings from Nagoya University Graduate School of Law (GSL)

The Nagoya University Graduate School of Law (GSL) is offering international students and legal professionals an English-language based program in comparative law and politics for the academic year of 2015. The program is entitled “Training the Next Generation of Top Asian Legalists - From Self-reliance to Networking,” which will lead to an LL.M. (Comparative Law) Program in Law and Political Science and an LL.D. (Comparative Law) Program in Law and Political Science. A limited number of scholarships from the Japanese Ministry of Education, (Monbukagakusho: MEXT) are available for the October Admission of the above programs.

Today, with increasing levels of cross-border interaction and inevitable frictions emerging in societies driven by market dynamics, legal and political skills are essential to the successful management of affairs in such contexts. In the interest of peace and prosperity, it is a grave duty for any faculty of law or politics to contribute to the education of specialists in these areas. To fulfill our educational and research mission, the Graduate School, as a leading center of legal and political study in Japan, has developed further the program established in 1999 for “Human Resource Development Contributing to Asian Technical Legal Assistance” by strengthening the self-reliance of Asian countries, through legal professional networking between them, and by training a future generation of “Asian leaders” in law and politics who can contribute to nation-building through the construction and sustainment of legal systems and the provision of education in law. Under this concept the program itself has been renamed as described above. It is expected that the program will create a structure for new networking potential among former students and provide feedback to the Graduate School.

With these aims in mind, the program puts an emphasis on a high level of generalist-training balanced between a curriculum offering fundamental grounding in law and politics through classes conducted in English and the individual guidance of supervisors provided for overseas students from various backgrounds, along with a wealth of extra-curricular supports within the faculty and the University. Each student can immerse themselves in the joys of learning, whilst building strong bonds with fellow students from various nations and regions. In this way we seek to provide the conditions for our students to reach their full potential. Each year, overseas students who join our programs enrich us further by bringing with them the immediate experience of their countries of origin.

Program for Human Resource Development Contributing to Asian Technical Legal Assistance*

The Graduate School, since 1998, has strengthened its commitment to academic and research work mainly related to legal and political reform and legal training in selected Asian countries, by providing expertise in building the legal and political systems necessary for the transition to a market-oriented model of government and regulation, a democratic system of politics, and a civil society governed by the rule of law. To fulfill its main objective of the long-term development of human resources, the Graduate School established an English-taught program in Comparative Law and Politics in 1999, titled “Program for Human Resource Development Contributing to Asian Technical Legal Assistance.” Since then, this program has produced approximately 240 graduates. The graduates from this Program continue to be engaged in the building of their nations as independent legal professionals responding to the needs of their time, fulfilling their important role in this new period as internationally-minded Asian leaders. A network has emerged amongst these graduates and this has created a structure for finding new talent and for offering active feedback to the Faculty so as to create a diverse and varied academic environment.

LL.M. (Comparative Law) Program in Law and Political Science

◆ Objectives

As mentioned above, the Master's degree seeks to produce people endowed with high-level general and balanced abilities. The curriculum is constructed around the following elements:

- (1) A broad and basic training in law and political science,
- (2) Studies in the principles of a just market economy, the rule of law, human rights, and democracy conducive to a market economy system,
- (3) Highly specialized research involving analyses of the situation in the student's own country with a view to exploring solutions,

- (4) Acquisition of the abilities and techniques needed for theoretical and practical thinking,
- (5) A system of collective and flexible individual guidance in the independent academic writing and the research methods needed for this,
- (6) The promotion of comparative research in group discussions with Japanese students.

◆ Features

The distinctive features are as follows:

- (1) Provision of a variety of course options from which students may choose;
- (2) Focused instruction in research methods and academic writing through a suite of Academic Writing courses that run the length of the program in support of the thesis writing process; and

- (3) Individual and specialized tutorials with supervisory professors in the subject area of each candidate, in close coordination with the academic writing courses referred to above.

◆ Language

As courses and supervising are conducted in English, competence in the English language is essential. Students are also strongly encouraged to build skills in spoken and written Japanese both before and after coming to Japan, as it is the most common medium of expression in both academic studies and everyday life. Furthermore, when students and instructors are expressing themselves outside their native language, discussions related to the subjects in the areas of politics and law become difficult. We, therefore, stress the importance of attendance for the first six months in the intensive Japanese language study course at the Nagoya University International Language Center.

◆ Academic Year

The 2015 Academic Year is divided into the autumn term which begins in October 2015 and the spring term which begins in April 2016.

◆ Program of Instruction

The duration of the Program is at least two years. The Program aims to offer the independent curriculum below so as to train talented professionals who will have learned the broad basics of law and politics and have balanced general skills, equipping them to take on the burden of nation building through the creation of legal systems in countries undergoing development.

The program is complemented by social activities, student mentorship arrangements, private sector internships, annual participation in the Japan Inter-Collegiate Negotiation Competition, and a set of student-driven cross-national seminars (the Peer Support Initiative). These features of our learning environment reinforce and supplement the opportunities of the traditional academic curriculum in law and politics. Classroom instruction is enriched through course offerings taught by legal staff from major local corporations, practicing Japanese lawyers, and reporters with front-line experience in covering both domestic and foreign news for Japanese media organizations. Optional intensive courses offered between terms further supplement the core curriculum. Students may also include credits taught at the neighboring Graduate School of International Development (GSID) as part of the overall 30 credits required for their degree. Courses outside the program but within the scope of the student's research interests may also be approved, depending on educational and research requirements.

In addition to the coursework obligations, students are required to set practical research themes based on systemic topics related to market economic development and produce theses from a comparative perspective. To progress with their research topic, students will receive individual and specialized tutorials from a supervisor in thesis supervision and at the same time will be offered group and staged guidance through an initial mandatory academic writing semester course followed by two semester-length courses. Thesis writing guidance is a major component of our Program enhancing the abilities for self-initiated research, data collection skills, methods of thinking and analysis.

◆ Requirements of Obtaining the Degree of Master of Laws (Comparative Law)

In order to obtain the degree of Master of Laws (Comparative Law), students are required; (1) to be enrolled in the Graduate School for at least two years, (2) to earn a minimum of 30 credits, including 10 credits from the compulsory courses "Academic Writing I" and "Special Research I & II," (3) write a master's thesis and (4) pass an oral defense of the thesis. Students' research, submitted as a master's thesis, will be carried out under supervision of a designated faculty supervisor for two years. "Special Research I" and "Special Research II," which represent supervised work toward the preparation of the thesis, are each worth four credits.

◆ Admission Procedures

The total number of openings in the Combined Graduate Program in Law and Political Science at the Graduate School in each year is 35. Applicants are expected to be mainly from the Asia-Pacific region with the intention of pursuing careers within government ministries or in academic institutions as researchers in the fields of law and political science. The Graduate School will screen candidates on the basis of research proposal and submitted application documents, supplemented by an interview.

LL.D. (Comparative Law) Program in Law and Political Science

◆ Objectives

The Program aims to create specialists in law and political science equipped with a high degree of practical ability, using the research skills cultivated at masters level and refining their degree of specialization, and at the same time to train professionals who are capable of organizing research at a high level in relation to the provision and reform of political and legal systems in their own countries using a broad perspective on law and politics.

◆ Admission Policy

In keeping with the overriding objective of providing opportunities for academic and practical research across the fields of law and politics, especially in the field of law reform, social planning and cooperative “Asian Legal Assistance” in a wide sense of the meaning, applications to this program are open to those applicants who have demonstrated exceptional performance in their studies and whose research purpose meets the program objective of making a contribution towards decisions and discoveries regarding practical and theoretical issues in the field of Asian Legal Assistance and other related areas.

◆ Features

The features of the Program are the cultivation of the ability of the student to engage in legal development activities in their home country. To this end, students are required to carry out independent research in their subject area under the guidance of their supervisor. By attending critical discussion sessions, students can go beyond their own specific conclusions, however correct, and develop the ability to appraise and benefit from the research of others. These sessions, which help teach students how to evaluate research outcomes, play a major role in the creation of the each student's thesis. There is also a research management program to train students to organize groups of researchers and to conduct large-scale research. An internship program is also provided to aid active and actual understandings of systems thus connecting theoretical research and practice.

◆ Requirements for obtaining a Degree of Doctor of Laws (Comparative Law)

In order to complete the doctoral program and obtain a degree of Doctor of Laws (Comparative Law), a student: (1) must have spent three years or more on the doctoral program; (2) must submit a dissertation upon completion of research conducted on their own initiative under the guidance of supervisors; and (3) must pass an examination of the submitted dissertation. However, those deemed to have completed research of exceptional quality may be awarded the doctorate after at least one year of enrollment. Participation in the Critical Discussion Sessions along with regular meetings with a faculty supervisor is a condition for the submission of the dissertation. Participating in the research management program and internship program is strongly recommended.

◆ Admission Procedures

The Graduate School will screen candidates on the basis of submitted master's thesis (in the case of applicants who are finalists in a master's program, the draft thesis will be accepted for this purpose), documents including a proposed program for dissertation and references from the president or dean of applicants' previous schools and by an interview which will be conducted based on the master's thesis and a research proposal for a dissertation. As supervision is conducted mainly in English, competence in the English language is essential, proof of English language proficiency being a requisite for application. Finally, as Japanese reading ability is required in certain areas toward the LL.D. (Comparative Law) Degree, the Faculty may require, for reference, proof of the applicant's Japanese language ability.

Advice to Applicants

It is essential that students can write their own thesis to an acceptable standard within the designated time frame. Consequently the Research Proposal is of critical importance in the decision of whether or not to admit applicants. The first step in the application is the initial document screening. However this plays a further role in shaping the brief but crucial interview applicants in the final stages undergo. The initial proposal is also the starting point for the supervision of successful applicants; a proposal that is clear, concise, well supported and well-reasoned provides a better basis for advice and support, particularly in the first months of study. Accordingly, you are well advised to take particular care in the drafting of these portions of your application. These should describe distinctly your interests and research objectives which should have some originality. Generally speaking, when reviewing applications or conducting interviews, the following factors will be at the forefront of our thinking:

- (1) Is there evidence of sufficient foundational knowledge and research skills so that the candidate can begin work on a substantive research immediately upon entering the Graduate School? The reviewers will be concerned with both general knowledge in the field of law and specialized skills and knowledge necessary to the proposed topic. Are you familiar with the major scholars in the area? Are you aware of recent trends? Do you have a sense of the key issues in the area, and are you able to relate them to a larger context?

- (2) Is there a clear, concise, and meaningful research topic? Setting the purpose and objectives of a project is one of the most difficult tasks in research. Researchers invariably struggle to identify a topic and direction that is workable, novel and sufficiently challenging to be attractive to an audience. With classes to attend and seminars to prepare for, time will fly; it is therefore extremely important that you show sufficient knowledge, sense of direction and receptiveness to good advice to convince the reviewer that you know your way around the subject, where you want to go with it, and how to get there.
- (3) Is the topic a good fit for research in Japan? While your proposed topic may concern international matters or the laws of third countries, the reviewers will be looking for connections with Japan, and specific ways in which the topic you have chosen is a good fit for this research environment.

- (4) Is there knowledge of the Japanese situation? Do you know the basic outlines of Japanese law, politics and administration? What is Japan's position or experience within your topic area? It is important that you show this knowledge in an obvious way; the reviewers will be looking for it in your application. At the interview, they are likely to pose questions in more detail than what you have written in your application.
- (5) Have you investigated us? Information on our programs and our staff are available on the World Wide Web. Members of our faculty publish in English, Japanese and other languages. Projects, research seminars, conferences and symposia take place in our faculty. You should be aware of our work. You should also familiarize yourself with the work of members of our faculty who specialize in your chosen area.

In closing, we would stress that, whatever the result, your choice to apply to our programs presents an opportunity for learning and personal growth. We encourage you to do your best in preparation and face the challenge of the application process with skill and effort.
