To everyone studying at the Department of the Combined Graduated Program in Law and Politics

Dean of the Graduate School of Law

Nagoya University

Professor SADAKATA Mamoru

Congratulations to all of you who have just entered the Graduate School of Law at Nagoya University. My guess is that you have come here with a fresh determination and great expectations of the future.

The Nagoya University Department of Law was established in 1950. It has upheld without fail for 60 years an academic spirit of freedom and openness, promoting research and education, beholden to no outside powers or authorities. We take pride in our learning environment where teachers and students coexist in mutual trust and respect, an environment where hopes are heard and frontiers forged.

In 1999 the School sought to enhance its graduate component and to promote a system to embrace the increasing sophistication and international nature of academia. At a time when the bonds of the international community grow more intimate with ongoing globalization, and greater complexity and fluidity is emerging at a regional level, research and education in law and politics must seek to cultivate persons of courageous mind who can engage with paradigm-shifting and transformative intellectual constructs and who can stand their own at the frontiers of our times.

In response to these changing social and scholarly needs, in 2004 the “Nagoya University Law School” was established with the goal of producing legal practitioners processed with solid legal training and advanced practical skills. The Graduate School was formed into two specialist departments: the Department of the Combined Graduate Program in Law and Politics and the Department of Practical Legal Personnel Training (Nagoya University Law School).

In the Department of the Combined Graduated Program in Law and Politics, the following three programs were established to produce researchers, highly specialized professionals, and teachers in the fields of law and politics. In these programs students study the theories and applications of law and political science. They gain the scholarly skills and excellence needed to take on roles demanding high levels of professionalism, and through this they contribute to cultural development.

The Program for Academics is offered as an attractive educational program to create the next generation of young, well-rounded and highly specialized researchers in Japanese law and politics. It is proud of its results and tradition having produced already many accomplished university teachers. The Applied Program for professionals aims to produce people of international stature endowed with highly specialist knowledge of law and politics who will contribute at the core of society. Finally, there is the Comparative Law Program which is aimed at overseas students and seeks to produce internationally talented people in the areas of comparative law and politics, and pays particular concern to the provision of the legal expertise needed for the ongoing privatization and opening of markets being experienced in systems and countries undergoing transition.

These three courses are mutually accessible to each other. The graduate students can take great advantage of this in regard to their research topics and future professions. For example, Japanese graduate students can participate in exchanges with colleagues from various countries enabling them to learn new languages or gain information about the laws in those countries. This gives rise to an intellectual environment that goes beyond just Japan enabling engagement with issues of international concern.

In this handbook for graduate students you will find essential information about each of the programs offered by the School and about researching as a graduate student. It will also be useful in your discussions with your supervisors and for creating interesting and innovative research plans.
